Module 4

When creating my design I reviewed past Professional Writing student's websites. I first decided what useful skills I have that are related to writing and design. I decided those were website design, writing, editing, and photography. Then I asked myself "How is a potential boss going to know details about my past and history? If they decide they like me then how will they contact me?" These questions are what inspired a resume page and contact page. I have created websites before and always make sure to include a contact form on the page because this is a very easy way for a company to get in touch with you if they are interested in hiring you. After reviewing my main pages I wanted to include some information I will have on each page. For example, on website design I am going to have links and pictures of my website creating experience which includes creating Peace Love Taste (peacelovetaste.tumblr.com) and TAP South Florida (tapsouthflorida.com). I reasoned that each page needed a viable example otherwise it was useless so for writings I will include sample writings, editing I will include information about editing my High Schools Literary Magazine, and photography I will create Flickr's or broadcast photos I have taken.

The navigation page is very similar, except I added a footer. I decided the website would be too cluttered with a header or sidebar since I am making 6 pages and those pages should be the most prominent thing on the site. I decided I should have a small footer that includes a email and phone number for someone to be able to contact me quickly and efficiently and they will never get confused on where to find my information. I have seen this on many personal websites, and find this very useful and smart.
